People always experience conflict at home, work place, school and many places. People experience conflict in every stage of their lives influenced by many factors. Some causes of conflict may be lack of understanding, selfishness and conflict of interest. The ability to resolve conflicts with one another is a critical life skill especially in today's world of diversified interests. This passage therefore describes steps to resolve any kind of conflict influenced by any cause.

Open communication is the first and foremost step to resolve conflict. A conflicting party should express how he or she feels about the situation. At this stage, avoid opposing what the other party did. Rather, each party must focus on the problem at hand and back up one's action if necessary. Each party should stick to facts and not emotions. This avoids unnecessary quarrels when people have conflicting perceptions.

After communication, what follows is active listening. A person in conflict must listen to what the other person says without interrupting. Each party must try to be objective when presenting his side of argument. This is the time that everybody must ask open-ended questions. This moment of listening makes sure that each side understands what the other person thinks and how he or she feels at that time.

A listening ear renders a platform of identifying causes of error in oneself or the other side.

The other critical step in resolving conflict is review of options. Conflicting parties must talk over the options highlighting strengths and weakness of each option. Both parties must look for options that benefit everyone. This means, both parties must come up with as many options as they can. However, no party should feel pressured to come up with one answer immediately. It is this step too that both parties can agree to bring a third party for extra ideas if necessary.

The final step is to select an option that acts as a win-win solution. Both parties must work together to weigh the brainstormed options. They should rank the options from good to best options on horizontal scale. Sometimes the options can be ranked vertically from low impact to high impact. In either case, both parties must select an option which is best or of high positive impact. Thus, it is at this time to let go of options that benefit one side and leave the other one disadvantaged. Both parties must use reason to choose the best option and not aggression.

In summary, conflicts are normal and unavoidable. They are spice of life. What matters most is to follow necessary steps to resolve them before they get out of hand. Conflicts must not reach to quarrels, fights or wars.

SECTION B (40 marks)

2. Read the following passage carefully and answer all the questions that follow.

The morning light pierced through the gap of their orange French window curtain. The air conditioner struggled to bring down the room temperature as it was persistently blazing throughout that week. Madam Zibonyongo was hearing none of her husband's apologies despite kneeling before her. She slapped him harder than before.

"For how long should I caution you to take the children to school before 7:00 am?" Madam Zibo as nicknamed by fellow women in the neighbourhood shouted at her husband.

"Hear me out please! You know I am sick. I couldn't wake up in time to prepare their breakfast." The husband responded jerking while on his knees. Madam Zibo was holding a sharp knife on her left hand and retorted, "I am fed up with your lame excuses! Next time this happens again; this little sharp steel will slice your limb like Irish potatoes. Now get out of my sight!"

The husband hurriedly got up and noticed that Thandizo, their first daughter was already sobbing. The way her mother yelled at her father was dehumanizing.

"Thandizo, are you okay? You are running late for school. Go get your brother's lunch bag. I'll be waiting for you in the car." He said and carried Mabvuto, their last born on his shoulder to the car.

In an instant, Thandizo joined him in the car and drove off. He looked at his daughter from the rear view mirror and noticed her discomfort. She had squeezed her face tightly and was looking out through the side glass. He already knew the answers to the questions he could ask her. He then focused on the road traffic.

Thandizo frowned and hardened her face more. She tried very much to keep away from her father but failed. She burst into tears that scared everybody on board. “Why is mom shouting at you like the house help we see in the movies?” He remembered how his wife tried to dismantle the fifty-two-inch plasma television mounted on the wall just because he tried to check time on his wife’s phone. Thandizo continued, “She sends you on errands not meant for you. Is mom the one who married you?”

He couldn’t believe his ears. He almost lost control of the steering wheel. The fact that the question was from a seven-year-old daughter sent cold shivers. He felt really cold but started sweating. He never knew whether it was an impact of his sickness or the situation at hand. He drove on.

Thandizo remembered what her classmates once told her. She remembered that their mothers were doing household chores. They prepared their children for school while their fathers were asleep. It was their father still who went to work. She really got jealous of them and pitied herself. She continued waiting for a response anyway.

Her father tried to hide his tears from his daughter by concentrating on the wheels. She was still young and wouldn’t understand what his marriage was all about. He just chose to be dishonest. He told her that what her mother did was to correct him and that was normal for grown up people. He advised Thandizo and Mabvuto not to feel bad. Families were different and such things always happen somewhere. It was not in his household only. He went ahead convincing her that time would come that some new other friends would explain her similar ordeal taking place in their homes.

Thandizo kept on probing her father. She asked him whether slapping and shouting were also normal amongst elders. She even asked why in Nigerian movies, fathers fought back. Another lie came from his father. He explained while laughing that movies were not real stories. They were just meant to entertain and provide moral lessons to those who watch them. He tried his best to keep his daughter off the matter. It might actually affect her emotionally and also affecting her studies.

“But dad...” She was interrupted immediately. “Stop Thandizo, face your studies and take care of your little brother. Leave adult matters for them to settle.” He drove into the school compound. He dropped them and wished them luck before driving out of the school compound. He promised them to be back in the afternoon as a normal routine.

Thandizo’s father was dying slowly inside. It was obvious his daughter was aware of the torture he underwent every day. He drove into an eatery and parked. If he should return at that time, Zibo would be on his neck with another task that might earn him this time a cut.

May be Thandizo was right that his wife married him. As he sat in the car waiting patiently for when to alight and enter the eatery for a meal so that he took the drugs properly, his phone started ringing. “Where are you? So where is the breakfast you prepared?” Madam Zibo’s voice echoed in anger.

“I cooked only for the children because I was hasty. I’m stuck in the traffic right now.” He produced another white lie. He then decided to have a take away and serve his wife as breakfast. He quickly paid for the take away. He drove off. On his way home, he thought of separation or divorce. He didn’t know which one would be better. He suddenly felt dizzy and struggled to focus. Crush! ...He woke up on a hospital bed the other day. Both legs were suspending in the air wrapped in Plaster of Paris. He gazed at his left side of bed. His elder sister was looking at him. Her look was speaking stories in volume. But where would the wife be?
